Many people are unhappy at work because their jobs don’t suit their personalities. Although people are complex, author Peter Urs Bender classifies people into four personality types. To make it simple, he compares people to birds. The four bird types are owl, eagle, dove and peacock.

Owls are analytical people who like to know how things work. These people work best in jobs with numbers and facts. Eagles like to be in the driver’s seat. They are born leaders and like to be the boss. The dove is a bird that represents peace. So, dove personalities excel in jobs where they are helping others. Lastly, the peacock is the show-off. These people like attention and like to be popular.

They are most productive in jobs where they can be very social. Bender recommends taking a look at your personality before you choose your career. People are happier in jobs where they use their strengths.
